Family life has become increasingly international and spread across different countries. People travel from their home country to work, study, and live abroad and in doing so may meet and form relationships abroad. For English family lawyers, international families may have connections with more than one legal system. For family members themselves, their international connections may mean that their personal relationships will fall to be regulated under a legal system that is different to that of the country from which they originate. This chapter explores when the English court will recognise family relationships created in other countries and take decisions regulating relationships with a foreign dimension. It considers the central aspects of international family law, the law relating to foreign marriage, divorce, and children, including international child abduction in order to examine how English law responds to these concerns.
