A dissertation or research project is often an important part of legal studies. It can be viewed as the culmination of three or four years of hard work because it is usually completed in the last year of the degree. This chapter explores the nature of legal research projects and dissertations. It considers how to complete them successfully, taking a broadly chronological approach to the issues arising. While the approach here may not follow precisely the guidelines set out by the law school, it can still provide markers to guide the student through the process, from constructing and refining the project proposal, to writing and rewriting, all the way through to final submission. The chapter also discusses further the use of relevant resources, drawing upon the earlier discussion of research in Chapter 8, and the important relationship with the dissertation or project supervisor.
