Most universities will offer the opportunity to spend some time studying abroad during the course of a law programme. Spending time studying abroad can be an inspiring and valuable experience. It can enhance the study skills, social skills, and employability, as well as offering the chance to experience a new place and culture and just do something a little bit different. But studying abroad also brings challenges. This chapter looks at different ways in which the student can experience study abroad, and the benefits that commonly accrue from the experience. It also considers some of the downsides to help the student to weigh up their options properly, and to ensure that they are fully prepared for both their time abroad, and their return home.
