This chapter examines the significance of the principle of the legislative supremacy of Parliament. The discussion covers the traditional view of the principle, as well as a competing view of legislative supremacy of Parliament, referred to as the ‘new’ view or the ‘manner and form’ argument. The chapter also considers the doctrine of implied repeal; the meaning of entrenchment; the Parliament Acts 1911 and 1949; Union legislation; legislative supremacy and the EU; legislative supremacy and devolution; and legislative supremacy and the Human Rights Act.
