This chapter discusses the main remedies for torts: damages and injunctions. In tort, damages are primarily compensatory and are intended to restore to the claimant what he has lost. Damages may be punitive or aggravated. They may be awarded in a lump sum, or in periodic or provisional form, and may be subject to deductions. An injunction is an order of the court requiring the defendant either to do something (mandatory injunction) or to cease doing something (prohibitory injunction). Interim injunctions anticipate trial of the full issue. Upon death, a remedy may be obtainable on behalf of the deceased or his dependents.
