Cohabiting couples do not have any intrinsic legal rights by simply cohabiting. The ‘common law wife/husband’ does not exist in law, despite many believing that it does. This chapter discusses the legal position of cohabitants and financial remedies. This includes the Law Commission Proposals in order to try and allow cohabitants to gain some financial relief in certain circumstances. The legal remedies available to separating cohabitants including establishing legal title and a beneficial interest, is outlined. This also includes resulting and constructive trusts. Finally, the position of cohabitants in relation to the family home and Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act is discussed.